Course Description: This course will provide a survey of major environmental policy and law with particular reference to Florida case studies. It is a designated core course. Our society attempts to provide environmental protection through the articulation of public policy codified in the form of laws and regulations. This course explores the basic ethical, legal, scientific, and economic principles that underlie environmental policy. Specific examples of federal, state and local environmental laws and regulations are examined as a vehicle for understanding the intent and scope of current environmental policy.

The course will also combine at several points with URP 6421 Environmental Land Use Planning and Management taught by Dr. Kathryn Frank, in order to relate environmental planning and policy considerations. The combination will also bring planning and design students together to share perspectives and interests.

Prerequisite Knowledge and Skills: None

Purpose of Course: To provide students with a general working knowledge of federal/state/local environmental policies and their purposes, especially as they relate to the practice of landscape architecture and planning.

Course Goals and/or Objectives: The primary objectives of this course are for students to develop an understanding of the following topics:

- The environmental planning context for policy
- The history of US environmentalism as a basis for understanding policy
- Ecological principles as a basis for policy
- Economic theories as a basis for policy
- Legal principles as a basis for policy
- Federal environmental policy
- State environmental policy
- Local environmental policy
- Current topics in environmental policy

Teaching Philosophy: In this course we hope to foster a dynamic and interactive learning environment for both students and instructors. Our goal is to provide students with the basic information and background necessary to understand environmental policy in the US, while fostering analytic discussion, student participation, and student-led learning opportunities within the classroom.

Instructional Methods: Course instruction will be primarily based on lectures, class discussions, assigned readings, and student presentations of assigned work.

Grading Policies:
